What Does the Pope Wear? A Guide to Papal Garments and Their Meanings (Part 4)

The Triregnum or Papal Tiara was worn by popes from as early as the 8th century until the middle of the 20th century. Pope Paul VI was the last pope to wear the triregnum, which received its name because it has three tiers of crowns made of silver or gold and adorned with diadems. This fancy piece of headgear is shaped like a beehive, ending with a round tapered end called an ogive and topped by a cross. Today, the miter is worn instead of the triregnum on solemn or ceremonial occasions.

Episcopal insignia that the pope wears on his person at all times:

A Pectoral Cross is worn by bishops, cardinals, abbots, and of course, the Holy Father. It is called a “pectoral” cross because it is worn near the pectoral muscle that protects the heart. In keeping with this guideline of wearing it near the heart, some pontiffs wear the pectoral cross with the gold cord pinned near one of the buttons on their cassock so that the chain falls in two loops on their chest and the cross sits higher (Pope John Paul II’s preferred look). Other popes wear the chain straight down their chest (this was how Pope Francis wore his). Each pope chooses his own unique pectoral cross.

The Fisherman's Ring is a gold signet ring that each new pope receives during the solemn Mass for his election to symbolize his authority. The ring is engraved with the pontiff’s name and an image of St. Peter. Until 1842, popes would use their fisherman’s ring to seal private correspondences and certain documents of the Holy See. When a pope dies, his fisherman’s ring is destroyed by the camerlengo (the cardinal in the papal household who manages the Holy See until a new pope is elected). The ring is smashed with a hammer in the presence of all the Cardinals to prevent forgery and symbolize that this pope’s authority has ended.
